Psychiatric nursing jobs are among the most demanding, and the need for qualified registered nurses to fill these mental health jobs is great. Here are seven things to know if you're considering a job as a mental health RN. The assignment will discuss the importance of assessment in mental health nursing focusing on a 54-year-old lady suffering from major depression. The Department of Health (DOH) 2010 pointed out that depression is a disorder of mood and may be characterized by low mood and feelings of unhappiness, exhaustion, self-blame, and suicidal thoughts. A recent study revealed 100% of undergraduate students believed psychiatric mental health nursing was an important and relevant part of nursing education but over 50% felt unprepared to care for the mentally ill after completion of their clinical experiences.

In conclusion, I look at mental health nursing today with sadness. The enthusiasm and imagination of those pioneers failed to inform and inspire the rest of the professionals. When I went to work as a tutor in one of the big mental hospitals in the mid-1970s, I found some cosmetic changes but the ethos and, because of the high proportion of nursing home residents with a mental illness other than dementia, the quality of mental health care in nursing homes is a major clinical and policy issue.
